The jury went out to deliberate, and the thought of that baby was photographed on their minds, and had it not the verdict would have been different, but as one juror said afterward, While we had a wealth of sympathy for that poor woman and her large family to support, we knew the prisoner didn't have any, and we figured that she would do better without him, and we found him guilty."

The baby act also affected the court, who spoke of his sympathy for the struggling woman when sentencing Mallett, but the man's record was too black for the court to let him off easily. Mallett also pleaded for mercy, referring to his little babe who needed his care.
